RESEARCH

Current Research Interests

Developing Economic Indicators of Coastal Health

This research, funded by grants from the Packard Foundation and the Santa Monica Bay Restoration Commission, seeks to develop historical time series of indicator data for economic activities that are dependent upon environmental health in the Morro Bay and Elkhorn Slough estuaries. Time series data will be linked to ecological indicators to explore the influence of ecological change on economic activities.

Quantifying Non-Consumptive Use Values in California's Marine Sanctuaries

This research, funded by Resources Legacy Fund Foundation and N.O.A.A. will quantify non-consumptive uses and users (e.g. private boating, kayaking, scuba diving, whale watching, etc.) in the Channel Islands and Monterey Bay Marine Sanctuaries. The research also will model the spatial choices of non-consumptive users to determine how marine management strategies influence non-consumptive uses and users.

The Economic Impacts of Climate-Driven Sea Level Rise on California Beaches

This research, funded by the California Energy Commission's Climate Change Center, will investigate how beach visitation and the associated market and non-market values of beach recreation are likely to change in Southern California given predictions about sea level rise in the region. The work is joint with Dr. Phil King of San Francisco State University.

The Economic Value of Beach Size in Southern California

This research, funded by the California Department of Boating and Waterways, expands upon the models developed by the Southern California Beach Valuation Project to examine the economic impact of beach size and width in southern California. The research will inform a variety of policies designed to protect beaches and sources of beach sediments.
